Verification of Student Identity – Distance Learning:
The @WashULaw distance learning track of the LL.M. in U.S. Laws program uses technology to verify the identity of the students. First, each student provides a copy of his or her passport or other form of official photo identification. Each student is interviewed via the learning platform and the interview is recorded. During that live meeting, the interviewer asks questions intended to verify both the information provided in the application and to confirm that the applicants’ English skills and substantive legal knowledge are consistent with the written essays and recommendations.

Synchronous classroom interaction will occur in small groups where all participants and the instructor are visible to each other and access to the website requires secure logons and passcodes. In addition, the law school is able to monitor access to material and screen time for each student.
